

History

Cove Four's roots began over fifty years ago when Barry Jaffe served as an apprentice in his father's staple wireforming business. In 1960 Barry left his Dad to go off on his own to start a separate wire forming company – Cove Four. Initially, Barry started small with just one machine to form and plate hooks for plastic hangers. It didn't take long for him to expand the business. As sales increased Barry reinvested the proceeds and bought larger, more sophisticated equipment and enlarged the manufacturing space. He also hired talented personnel who had the skills to design and manufacture a wide variety of wire formed products used in many, diverse industries, among them construction, hardware and agriculture.

Over the years, Cove Four continued to expand and to meet increased demand opened a west coast facility in Orange County, California in 1977, and a third facility in Juarez, Mexico in 1993.

In 2008, Barry's daughter Stephanie Jaffe Werner joined her father to further expand the company's business both domestically and in a growing global market. Under this joint leadership additional offices have recently been opened in China and India to further support Cove Four's "Supply Chain Management Division", the branch responsible for sourcing, manufacturing, and delivering OEM and finished products to their North American and international clients.

In 2010 Cove Four operates globally using its expertise in manufacturing, quality assurances, customer service and technical staffing to provide a continual supply chain of products to many segments of industry.
